

Georgia Project Firstline

The Georgia Department of Public Health (DPH) and the Georgia Hospital Association (GHA) are facilitating Project Firstline, an infection control training program for all front-line workers. The program is providing innovative and effective infection control training, and the content is designed to be easily understood and applied.

Project Firstline training materials and educational activities help empower health care workers in building their foundational knowledge of infection control.

Check out this CDC Project Firstline Infographic showing that the recommended health care infection control actions for COVID-19 work just as well at preventing and reducing transmission of the Delta variant. Learn the basic ideas behind infection control, how they work to prevent COVID-19, and how using infection control actions while you're at work can protect you, your patients, your coworkers, and your community.
